Notes: -Multiple-methods of replacing the CR/LF with a space exist. -Two of them are automatic. -The third one is a user-initiated process (setting the file-name filters via the Windows shell). Note that the first two are not really new, and have been implemented in Windows for over 10 years now. The last one is a relatively new one. It is possible to perform the last case from within the application itself, but this requires user-interaction. It is perfectly legal to read and write to the registry on Windows. As long as the file-name filters are set correctly, the text inside will be modified as needed. Various extension-types are supported. Note that file-extensions are not really handled as extensions, but are more like checks on the file-name. Many file-types are supported. It is possible to read and write to the registry on Windows.
