Worth noting is the fact that the final page is sized at “32 ppi,” which is exactly twice the resolution of a 4K Apple TV. It’s clear that the folks at Adobe are aiming straight at the CE market. The App Store is exactly the place they need to be in to succeed. ABOVE: Always looking for ways to save on the bottom line, Amazon employs the talents of editors who can apparently change a word without actually knowing how to spell it. BELOW: Amazon's bargain bin product page for the Samsung Galaxy Note 8. BOTTOM LEFT: Apple's Apple Watch goes on sale next week. ABOVE: Take a look at how Glade for Windows allows for real-time, dynamic UI/UX changes. BELOW: Samsung's Galaxy Note 8. BOTTOM LEFT: Apple's Apple Watch. Adobe’s pricing has been rather difficult to swallow for quite some time. Adobe Lightroom is probably the best example. Not only did it turn out to be far more expensive than its main competitor, but it also ended up costing cheaper than, frankly, Adobe Camera Raw. (The latter has often been used as a cost/value indicator, so it means that Adobe Camera Raw has been, for the most part, a decent bargain over the years.) Today, I am handing over the review reins to PixelKiller , who has written his own extensive review of the software. Here’s hoping that you find his analysis and opinions to be as timely and reliable as mine have been.
