AI++ and Type can be relied upon to do a fair job. However, it's not always a magical tool that means you won't have to change things manually should anything need to be corrected. There's also the Auto Fix option, one that can and will ask you to do things that you wouldn't always do manually. Once asked about a problem with a small image, it realized that straightening the image would make the problem go away. It then said, "I think that you should straighten this image." It didn't guarantee me that the image would look perfect, but didn't blatantly tell me that it wouldn't. I then used the Crop tool to eliminate the issue and was allowed to move on. Auto Fix is not perfect—there are some things it seems to get wrong—but it is getting better and it's probably a smart move for the latest version of Photoshop to be better at its tasks. In my 9 years of using Photoshop I had never encountered an issue similar to this. I have twice used Photocollage to try and merge a number of image files into one, this is a very simple process but I have the following issues: 1) I open the .psd file, use the select tool to select the first image, then the shift tool to select the second image. I merge them, receive the buttons saying they have not been processed however when I preview the image and save it, it saves it as a .psi file. Something I have never seen happen and on more than one occasion. This is a great software. Just wondering if there would be a feature and or option to create a high-quality JPEG preview out of all the RAW data in your Adobe Camera?>>

I can export any RAW file to a JPEG, with lots of options and viewing the quality settings. But if I need to make a high-quality preview I have to do it manually with the RAW file type. Having a feature like that would save so many time for me.
